after our misadventure, a woman presented herself at Stephen's home (I forgot to mention that he bore that name, also). It was the singer girl of the bar-room. How she discovered where he lived remained an unsolved mystery. She came to thank him And he, taking a kindly interest in her, drew from her her life's story. She felt that she had talent and had aspirations to become a singer of note. The wretched life that she was forced to live nauscated her. She had nothing in common, except misery, with those among whom she was forced to live; they nothing in common with her. If she but had the chance, she knew that she would succeed, but the stern necessity of winning daily bread forced her to waste her talents instead of cultivating them.

"Her tale moved him deeply and awakened his sympathy, so it was arranged that she had better quarters in a different section of the city. She no longer had to sing for a liying; he removed that necessity. She was laced in the bands of the best instructors in the city. Her advance nent was immediate and rapid. dumfounded at what he saw. The room was dismantled, stripped bare of everything except the furniture and heavier, larger curios. His heart stopped beating, a cold sweat broke out and stood in great beads upon his forehead. The thought rushed madly through his mind, had the friends of the man he had murdered discovered him and wreaked vengeance upon him in his absence? His wife! He sick ened and grew faint at the thought of what fate had overtaken her! He shook himself, trying to shake off the fear that clutched at his heart.

"'No, no, it cannot be that,' he said to himself. 'It is only a rearranging of the furniture which I have come upon.

"Reassured slightly by this meager hope, he stepped into the next room His reassurance fled from him as the waters of Erie flow over Niagara. It was stripped even barer than the first. In a frenzy of fear he hurried up the stairs. As he reached the landing, he stopped as if transfixed.

"A silvery peal of laughter issued over the transom of his wife's bedroom, followed by the deeper laugh of a man. It was his wife and his valet. "With a cry, he sprang across the hall and burst open the door. He reeled for a moment at the sight that he beheld. His beautiful, innocent wife was sitting on the lap of his trusted valet, clinking glasses with him. She shricked and fled from the room; the man, drawing a revolver, fired point blank at the awful countenanced figure within the doorway. The bullet stopped the onward rush for a moment, but only for a moment; it had not struck a vital part. With the inarticulate rear of a wounded animal, which came from the depths of his outraged being he sprang upon his valet. Together they struggled and swayed about the room, knocking down the chairs and overturning the table. Suddenly Stephen wrenched the revolver from the hand of the other man and pulle the trigger. The shot entered the valet's chest, and he sank to his knees weeks. Rather than walt the time imploring mercy. The master neither man, but a brute, seeking the life o another.
